

Rethinking the greenhouse

I'm sweaty. Between one workout session and another, I think of the relief of a stream, the very cold water that slightly evaporates on a hot day refreshes the air. Breath. Trees and plants need water and refreshment, now more than ever, and I need that too. In this garden I finally have the opportunity to return a favor, that favor that nature offers me every day. Here I can work on myself, on my body and likewise maintain this lush and thriving oasis with my hard work, exercise after exercise. That's why I'm here. Here everything is designed in a circular way: our muscles are the engine that feeds the green space that surrounds us. One more last effort!

Rethinking the greenhouse