

Airy

This garden visualizes the lines and flows of plants through a mobile structure at its center, and the climbing vines that grow upon it. The hanging mobile guides plant growth, while the vines extend along its form, tracing natural pathways within the space.

Below the mobile, the ground planting continues, creating continuity where vertical growth and horizontal expansion intertwine. As visitors move through the garden, they sensorially experience the rhythm and organic flow shaped by the growth of plants.

Through the presence of mobiles and plants, the garden reveals the delicate relationship between artificial structures and the plants within them—that is, between the artificial and the natural. The vertical and horizontal movements of the plants respond to light, air, and time, drawing the invisible sensitivities of the environment into view.

In these slow transformations, visitors perceive how nature continually redraws its boundaries. This garden offers not a map of geography, but one of growth, perception, and coexistence.
